We don't often hatch corns with such suggestive markings as this 2014 female Lavender Tessera. Her most distinctive feature not only indicates her gender but begs naming her for an Egyptian or Roman goddess, for the ankh marking on the crown of her head. Her other rare Lavender features include rare black eyes (for Lavenders) and her overall dark coloration that usually advertises a better lavender coloration at maturity. Not unlike the collateral affect on striping seen in Bloodred Tesseras, she has repeatedly broken striping like most Lavender Tesseras. She is 16" long, eating frozen/thawed medium pinky mice.
